

Via IDM Properties

That the art deco Hoover Building sat dormant for so long was a great shame to West London. So it's a blessing the building was recently converted into 66 flats by Interrobang, a local architecture practice. As part of its adaptive reuse, they reinforced the original structure with timber frames and added an extra level with slanted eaves that maintain the look of the Grade II-listed façade.

About us

The Spaces is a digital publication from VF Publishing exploring new ways to live and work. From residential buildings to public domains, co-working clubs to hotels and retail hot spots, we will look at the spaces that are pushing boundaries and meet the people who are changing how we live. Exploring the rich urban fabric of cities across the world, we want to inform and spark new conversations about design and property, while inspiring people to look at their environments differently.